Preamble Para 8	empower women and girls, combat discrimination based on older age , reduce poverty	Millions of older people living in cities face discrimination based on their older age on a daily basis when accessing services, using public transport and public spaces, and living within the community. Cities must commit to tackling age based discrimination to ensure equitable prosperity and cities for all.
Section A Additional point after point 24	We recognize that rapidly ageing urban populations is a reality that requires appropriate policies and perspectives to ensure the fulfillment of our human rights and our social, economic and cultural participation in cities and communities throughout our lives including into older age.	Alongside recognition of migration and displaced peoples, the New Urban Agenda must recognise ageing as a key demographic trend that will shape cities over the next 20 years, requiring appropriate perspectives and policies that ensure our rights are promoted and protected throughout our lives and into our older age.
Additional point after point 40	Recognising ageing urban populations, cities must eliminate discrimination based on older age and challenge ageist stereotypes to ensure that urban residents enjoy the full range of rights and full participation in city life throughout their lives and into older age.	When discussing the value of the diversity of cities, alongside recognising discrimination and violence against women and girls and the need to tackle anti-migrant sentiment, the New Urban Agenda must also recognise that older people face discrimination based on their older age on a daily basis when accessing services, using public transport and public spaces, and living within the community. Cities must commit to tackling age based discrimination to ensure equitable prosperity and cities for all.
